MONTHLY COMMENTARY

In March 2024, Asia ex-Japan equity market surged, largely due to the Korea and Taiwan markets. Taiwan technology names rallied in view of Hon Hai's AI server wins while Korean memory names also rose due to improved risk appetite towards AI. Although the China's Two Sessions did not bring major policy surprises, the Chinese government's reiteration of support for autos, biotech, property and renewable energy at the State Council offered some confidence to investors initially. However, there was some reversal in HK markets when the PBOC kept Medium-Term Lending Facility Rate unchanged at 2.5%, suggesting that more policy support was required.

NAV per share increased this month. By region, most of the markets surged. Among our holdings, Information Technology Sector was the main contributor. Notably, the out-performance of the semiconductor company was due to an earlier-than-expected ramp-up of Apple/Qualcomm new chips, raising its N3 utilisation rate, amid robust AI trends, sustained Intel outsourcing and PC recovery.

Looking ahead, we are incrementally more positive on the Asia ex-Japan equity market. We are favouring China/Hong Kong tactically as we are seeing some value given that there are some early signs that economic indicators are inflecting and policy remains supportive, with visible signs that the China government wants to invigorate the economy. We remain positive on Korea due to the government's Corporate Value-Up' Program as well as Korea and Taiwan semiconductor supply chain in view of the semiconductor growth upturn, driven by rising AI adoption. We are turning more cautious on India due to frothy valuations. We are overweighting ASEAN markets due to attractive valuations and them benefiting from the end of US rate hiking cycle and the diversification of supply chains away from China.

This fund aims to generate long-term capital growth through investing in a portfolio of large-cap Asia ex-Japan companies. We invest in up to 30 large cap stocks that are expected to increase their corporate value over the long term with sustainable free cash flow generation capability and consistent earnings growth potential. We leverage the bottom-up and top-down approaches to pursue high risk-adjusted returns.
